ABSTRACT

Arbuscular mycorrhizal fungi (AMF) can be hampered by soil floods and salt, yet they can be found in mangrove habitats. The function of mangrove ecosystems may be influenced by arbuscular mycorrhizal associations, although little is known about their role and balance in these dynamic systems(Thai Khan Ramírez-Viga, 2020). A study was carried out to under the role and function of glomalin as well as isolation of AM fungi spores from the Rachol ferry mangrove area. In rhizosphere soils, AM fungi are known to interact. All of the root samples showed typical AMF hyphal, vesicle, and arbuscular structures, demonstrating that AMF are key components on the landward margin of mangrove environments. AM spores were isolated from soil using a wet sieve and decantation process. AM spores were identified on the basis of morphological characteristics (Nibha Gupta, 2016).The soil samples were treated for glomalin analysis using spectrophotometry technique. A graph was plotted to obtain results using BSA as the standard (Qiang Wang, 2019).
