PROPOSED RESEARCH DETAILS

Project Summary:

Cashew apples are readily available as an agricultural waste in Goa, however, regardless of their high sugar contents and other basic nutrients needed for growth of yeasts, these are not used to their fullest extent as culture medium for yeasts strains and substrates for feni production. Various natural yeasts can be isolated from this source which could open the way towards discovering industrially-significant yeasts having unique feni production ability along with flavor metabolites thus contributing in feni production. These naturally fermenting yeasts are explored for different bio- transformational properties and its characteristics differ as per different geographic locations, type of yeasts and their bio- transformational capabilities. Fermentation using mixed novel yeast/unique yeast may provide a possible way towards improving the intricacy and improving the specific characteristics of the end product produced from fermented cashew apple juice. I propose to isolate and identify yeast strains from locally fermented cashew apple juice and evaluate its characteristics. This study can also explore yeast biodiversity in search of new biocatalysts by selecting yeast from fermented cashew apple juice thus representing a method for discovering novel yeast producing enzymes with various different volatile characteristics in feni production.

The clearance of wastes from industrial sources is a serious issue throughout the world. The distillery spent wash is acidic with high levels of biological oxygen demand and chemical oxygen demand and contains nutrient elements such as potassium (K), nitrogen (N), and phosphorous (P). Since it is a source of plant nutrients and organic matter, could be used for various agricultural crops. However, indiscriminate disposal of it has resulted in adverse impact on soil environments. It has been proposed herewith to determine the BOD, COD of the distillery spent wash to check for the quality of the spent wash.

Origin of the proposal:

Cashew apples are available in abundance in Goa and adjoining areas and thus serve as readily available raw material for the isolation of yeasts having industrial importance in feni industry. Fermentation of cashew apple juice using mixed yeast cultures may provide a way towards improving the intricacy and improving the specific characteristics of the end product produced from fermented cashew apple juice.

Except in Goa, cashew apples are not fully utilized anywhere else. This huge resource goes waste in spite of its value as a source of nutrients and a substrate for feni production and warrants due attention.

Definition of the problem:

Cashew distillate is produced all over Goa, BUT there is a need to obtain the feni of good quality. Having observed the inherent attributes in feni such as astringent smell, lack of original fruity flavor, inconsistent yield due to disparity in the methods of fermentation, there is a need to research these issues.

Keywords: Yeast, Cashew apple juice, fermentation, feni

Objectives:

- To isolate and identify yeasts from naturally fermented cashew apple juice from different locations and study their biotransformational properties.
- To assess the feni production status at CAZCAR Pent, Nanora, Bicholim-Goa using the co-inoculation of consortium of yeasts and,
- To assess the chemical constituents of feni to determine the BOD and COD and the mineral content of the spent wash during distillation to study the impact of Distillery Spent Wash Irrigation on Agricultural Soil.

Expected Output and Outcome of the proposal:

The proposed work will provide valuable information on the type of microflora occurring in naturally fermented cashew apple juice and its utilization in improving quality of the end product.

A repository of yeasts will be available for future research on biotransformational activities.
